There was a cold November wind blowing through 116th Street. It rattled the tops of garbage cans, sucked window shades out through the top of opened windows and set them flapping back against the windows; and it drove most of the people off the street in the block between Seventh and Eighth Avenues except for a few hurried pedestrians who bent double in an effort to offer the least possible exposed surface to its violent assault.

It found every scrap of paper along the street— theater throwaways, announcements of dances and lodge meetings, the heavy waxed paper that loaves of bread had been wrapped in, the thinner waxed paper that had enclosed sandwiches, old envelopes, newspapers. Fingering its way along the curb, the wind set the bits of paper to dancing high in the air, so that a barrage of paper swirled into the faces of the people on the street. It even took time to rush into doorways and areaways and find chicken bones and pork-chop bones and pushed them along the curb.

It did everything it could to discourage the people walking along the street. It found all the dirt and dust and grime on the sidewalk and lifted it up so that the dirt got into their noses, making it difficult to breathe; the dust got into their eyes and blinded them; and the grit stung their skins. It wrapped newspaper around their feet entangling them until the people cursed deep in their throats, stamped their feet, kicked at the paper. The wind blew it back again and again until they were forced to stoop and dislodge the paper with their hands. And then the wind grabbed their hats, pried their scarves from around their necks, stuck its fingers inside their coat collars, blew their coats away from their bodies.

35 The wind lifted Lutie Johnson's hair away from the back of her neck so that she felt suddenly naked and bald, for her hair had been resting softly and warmly against her skin. She shivered as the cold fingers of the wind touched the back of her neck, explored the sides of her head. It even blew her eyelashes away from her eyes so that her eyeballs were bathed in a rush of coldness and she had to blink in order to read the words on the sign swaying back and forth over her head.

45 Each time she thought she had the sign in focus, the wind pushed it away from her so that she wasn't certain whether it said three rooms or two rooms. If it was three, why, she would go in and ask to see it, but if it said two— why, there wasn't any point. Even 50 with the wind twisting the sign away from her, she could see that it had been there for a long time because its original coat of white paint was streaked with rust where years of rain and snow had finally eaten the paint off down to the metal and the metal had slowly rusted, making a dark red stain like blood.

60 It was three rooms. The wind held it still for an instant in front of her and then swooped it away until it was standing at an impossible angle on the rod that suspended it from the building. She read it rapidly. Three rooms, steam heat, parquet floors, respectable tenants. Reasonable.

Question 2 — Response 2B —

An urban setting is very diverse, and many people feel differently towards it. In a selection from Ann Petry's The Street, Lutie Johnson shows us that she has adapted to the urban setting. Johnson uses personification and imagery to show us how Lutie Johnson adapts to whatever situation she is encountering.

A very prevalent literary technique in the passage is personification, as above 3/4 of it are devoted to the personification of the wind. The author uses verbs such as “found, discouraged, grabbed” and “lifted” to show us how powerful the wind is, and how some residents either curse, or try to hide, or try to get wherever they’re going as quickly as possible. The wind gets into their coats and scarves and hats and “[sticks] its fingers inside their coat collars” (33). This personification helps re-establish the image that the wind is very powerful, and almost all the residents are trying to flee from it, except for Lutie Johnson.

Even though the wind makes her feel “naked and bald,” (367) and “[touches] the back of her neck [and] the sides of her head]” (39-40), Lutie Johnson stays put. This comes from her need to find shelter. The fact that she stays put in order to try and read a sign advertising an apartments shows that she has adapted with the urban setting, that is her relationship is one of survival, or adaptation. The narrator uses imagery as well to convey the winds power. She finely describes the way the wind is moving and pushing the sign from Luties vision so that the reader can understand how daunting it is to even read a sign. However, Lutie wins the small battle against the wind and her reward is finding an apartment with “Three rooms, steam heat, parquet floors, respectable tenants,” (60) which she finds reasonable.

The author uses strong personification and imagery to convey how powerful the wind is. However, Lutie Johnson is not daunted, instead she shows us that her relationship with the urban setting is that of an adaptive one. Lutie Johnson puts up with whatever obstacles the urban setting gives her in order to get what she is looking for, and this is the mark of a strong personality.
