ABOUT US

At John Hopkins, classrooms are inquiry based and conceptually focused, so students make connections between each of the eight required subject groups and the real world. The Center for Communications, Journalism and Multimedia (CJAM) develops broadcast and print journalism skills that students will be able to directly use if they choose to continue in an similar program and into the professional business world. Students will also utilize 21st century industry equipment to enhance their learning experience. They will select a “focus class” in which they will study their point of interest in great depth each day.

HIGHLIGHTS

- We are visited annually by international journalists from around the world. Our students have a chance to demonstrate their skills, as well learning even more from our visitors!
- Our school newspaper - JHOP Times is a three-time National Scholastic Press Association award winner (2014-2016).
- We have a fully digital broadcast studio - exclusively for our magnet students to utilize.
- Program students fully design and publish our school yearbook.
- Photos taken by students are displayed throughout the community and featured at an annual photo exhibit at The Studio@620.
